

What Do You Want to Have Happen?

*A 15-minute enquiry into the future
you want to bring into reality.*

Before we begin

Technology continues to expand what is possible. Only you can choose what is worth making.

This enquiry is where that choice begins.

This isn't a quiz.

It isn't an assessment.

There are no scores.

There are no right answers.

The purpose of the questions that follow is much simpler. To create enough space... for a possibility to emerge.

If you're willing, give yourself fifteen quiet minutes.

Answer deliberately.

Don't rush.

Don't try to predict where the questions are leading.

Simply notice what becomes visible.

Because...

Recognition begins in enquiry.

This enquiry isn't trying to...

- help you set goals
- help you become more productive
- help you discover your purpose
- help you think more positively
- force certainty

Its purpose is much simpler.

To help you recognise what matters enough to begin making.

Notice the present

What is happening now?

What feels full?

What feels flat?

What feels crowded?

What feels underused?

What feels misaligned?

Notice what keeps returning

What keeps attracting your attention?

Perhaps it is...

- a project
- a relationship
- a role
- a different pace of life
- a different kind of contribution
- a future that feels quietly familiar

A gentle prompt

What am I no longer willing to normalise?

What's no longer working for me?

What feels most alive now?

Answer in a few sentences.

But first ...

take a moment and read what you've written so far

From here...

Read what you've written.

What now feels most important?

What do you want to have happen?

Take your time. Complete this sentence.

Write by using Nouns and Adjectives because by not using verbs, you avoid the tendency to write to-do lists and/or attempts at problem solving.

What I want to have happen is —

Version 1

Version 2

Version 3

Version 4

If what you want to have happen were beginning to happen...

What would become visible?

Not the plan.

Not the explanation.

Simply what you would notice.

What feels most alive now?

Take a moment.

Read what you've written.

Then answer in a few sentences.

What is the next obvious move?

If you're unsure...

What would create more room for what you want? What can begin now?

What is one supporting action?

If you're unsure...

What small act would help this become real?

Before you leave

You began with a question.

Only you could answer it.

Perhaps nothing has been decided today.

That isn't the point.

If something has become just a little clearer...

then this enquiry has done its work.

Because...

Making reveals more of the possibility you've recognised.

You do not need every answer.

You need only enough recognition...

to begin.

Begin making.

Perhaps it begins the moment you recognize what you want to have happen . . .

then choose how you stand in relation to that possibility.

And if that possibility has become just a little clearer while you've been writing . . .

The Maker's Forge helps you make that possibility your next future.